WONDERLAND.

Our First Bear, and How It Was Killed.

In the Park—The Beauty of Mud Pies Lost in the Grandeur of Mud Pots.

IV.

From the headwaters of the Yellowstone we traveled to the northeast. In the afternoon of the second day we came to a pass which would lead us over to Grey Bull River, the main tributary of the Big Horn. The Indians whom we met on Green River informed us that we would find buffalo in this region, and we concluded to have some sport with this large game. We had decided to go into camp when the Guide saw a buffalo; the cook and Scientist claimed that the animal was a bear. The Cook and Guide would see. Leaving the horses in charge of the Scientist, they approached to within a few hundred yards of the brute, and found it to be a buffalo, grizzly, such as are found only in this region. It is useless to say that the boys changed their course when they made this discovery. Keeping to the right, they placed a ridge between themselves and the bear, and taking deliberate aim, with all eyes upon two trees, they fired, and of course, missed bruin. The second volley broke one of the animal's hind legs, and after some responsible howling and tumbling he ran directly towards the shooters, and they in turn ran toward the above-mentioned trees. They say that safely was not their object. They only wished to see which direction the bear took. Crossing a small creek, the bear passed around the ridge, and hastened to cool his wounds in a larger stream which lay to the right. To this place the Guide and Cook followed him, and when they came in sight their game had remained so long in the cold water, that he could do nothing but intimate to them what he would do if he had four legs instead of three. Standing at a safe distance they succeeded in putting six shots where they would do the most good and the seventh, fired by the Guide, went crashing through bruin's skull. The Guide and Cook had killed their first grizzly. Taking some steaks just to sample the meat we went into camp.

The next three days we spent in crossing the Sierra Shoshone mountains, not finding any buffalo and getting back to the Yellowstone. We traveled down this river with its bottoms rich with grass, extending on either side of the stream to the distance of a mile and a half.

Here on the Upper Yellowstone the gad flies, horse flies and mosquitoes were delighted to see the party, horses and men suffering alike from these pests. The "bugs" were not fastidious and seemed intoxicated with pleasant anticipations, whether sinking a shaft in a bootleg or burying their long lances in the cuticle of man or beast. The writer has seen a mosquito work diligently and with a hope illumined countenance to find blood in a piece of leather and die of grief when he could get nothing but foul air for his trouble and perseverance.

At 4 o'clock in the afternoon of July 14th, we came in sight of Yellowstone Lake. This beautiful sheet of water is situated in the southern half of the National Park. Thirty miles long by fifteen wide, with its crystal waters and densely timbered shores, it presents at any point a fine study for an artist and a shrine at which the worshipper of nature can offer his devotions. Traveling down the shores of the lake we found the timber so dense that we were obliged to ride in the water for some miles.

The next day we came to what are known as Locomotive Springs, so called from the peculiar hissing sound, caused by the escape of steam from the springs. These steam vents and springs are near what is called Steamboat Point, on the northeastern shore of the lake. The steam in many places escapes from apertures from one-eighth of an inch to three inches in diameter. Each builds for itself a little cone varying in color from bright red to white; the mud or paste of which they are formed being too hot to handle with comfort. The creeks which flow into the lake south of this point and between it and the river are alum creeks. The water is clear and inviting, but one swallow paints an expression upon a countenance such as one seldom sees.

From the springs we ascended Skunk Creek to its source in Turbid Lake, a distance of three miles. Turbid Lake is half a mile long by one-fourth of a mile wide, and its waters are in a constant state of ebullition. Here we decided to rest for a day and take in the wonders of the vicinity. In the forenoon of the following day we enjoyed a much needed bath in Game Trail Creek, a small feeder of the lake. Besides taking a bath we successfully carried on a laundry for two or three hours, and after a hearty meal and a nap we rode bareback a distance of three miles to Steamboat Point and Crystal Beach. Steamboat Point is a rocky bluff extending into the lake, and from an immense fissure in the rocks a steady discharge of steam takes place with a deafening roar.

The party took a bath in the icy waters of the lake, but it consisted of an oh! ah! oh! who! and a rapid movement for the shore. Riding, or rather racing, back in the evening, we came to some mud pots. Though the name is not suggestive of beauty, yet a more beautiful sight cannot be imagined. On the top of a hill and within a few feet of each other we counted fifteen cauldrons of mud, and in no two was the clay of the same tint nor consistency. Light buff, lavender, pale blue, pink, white and brown were some of the colors noticed. In some, continual boiling was kept up, while in others the action took place only at intervals. There was one cauldron in particular, some five feet in diameter, filled with white mud so heavy that the steam could scarcely force its way through. This huge mass would rise one or two feet and then the huge bubble would burst and form an immense flower which would remain until another bubble broke when it would be lost in one more beautiful and fresh than itself. These flowers were as regular in form as if moulded in wax and varied in size according to the size of the pot in which they were formed. Above many of these pools were cones from one to three feet in height from which great daubs of mud were thrown into the air from six ten feet. These cauldrons of mud are grand and one cannot stand near and watch their workings without letting a feeling of awe steal over him. We hastened back to camp and were soon dreaming of the youthful pastime of breaking windows with "mud-daubs."

BRIEF TELEGRAMS.

Clare County, Mich., has been devastated by hurricane and rain. Two million feet of timber was blown down and two men killed.

The fires around Georgian Bay, French River and Misskaha District, Canada, have been fearful, and for days the inhabitants were on the verge of suffocation from heat and smoke.

The society of the Army of the Cumberland has appointed a Garfield monument committee, to collect money, etc.

Senator Hampton's Views.

Charleston, S. C., 22.—Senator Hampton thinks that President Arthur will follow a conservative course, not only from his own convictions, but because public opinion will demand this of him; and I have strong hopes that everything will move on smoothly. In this event no harm can come to the south. As a member of the Senate, I propose to treat President Arthur precisely as I treated President Garfield, sustaining his administration in all measures that meet my approval, and opposing those that do not; but in no event shall I oppose him in a partisan and factious manner.
